For my crossing borders journey I chose to go to Thailand and support the organisation Volunteer English Bangkok.

This non-profit organisation tries to improve the educational level of rural and public schools, which are the places for the very poor population of Thailand to receive their education. Thailand struggles with inequality in education, so the organisation tries to improve this problem. The focus of the organisation is on introducing and teaching students in a motivating and enjoyable way, by playing with the students and having conversations with the them.

The school that I was send to is the Wat Niwet Thammaprawat Tempel School in Bang Pa in, which is in the Ayutthaya region.

It is about one and a half hours away from Bangkok and pretty central in Thailand. In the first picture one can see the temple that is working together with the school. The students have to pray in this temple every day. The school is just a hundred meter away from the temple. The school gives very poor students a chance to receive education.

The teaching was a lot of fun. The students are very intersted when they can get to know other cultures and see how the world outside of Thailand looks like. Everyone was very friendly.
