4. Research

Verbeek's work investigates the complex relations between human beings and technologies, and the blurring boundaries between them. He is one of the developers and main representatives of the approach of technological mediation, which has gained a prominent position in the philosophy and ethics of technology and in Science and Technology Studies. The mediation approach offers a novel way to conceptualize and empirically investigate the relations between human beings and technology, analyzing how technologies help to shape human practices, experiences, and interpretations of the world. It deals with questions like: How do technologies help to shape our knowledge of the world, like imaging technologies inform how scientists and medical doctors perceive and interpret phenomena? How do 'human enhancement technologies', like brain implants and neuroprostheses, urge us to revise the concepts we use to understand what it means to be human? And how to rethink the distinctions between humans and things, when human subjects appear so deeply interwoven with technological objects, and when objects appear to 'do' things in the social world?

Essential to the mediation approach is the way in which it connects philosophy to other disciplines, like the social sciences (e.g. science and technology studies), technology design, biomedical technology, and art. Verbeek's work aims to overcome the traditional divide between the sciences on the one hand and the humanities and social sciences on the other. He does not place philosophical reflection outside the realm of technology, but shows how it can be a critical and rigorous means to inform technological developments, and to understand technology as a social and cultural phenomenon. At the University of Twente he founded a PhilosophyLab, as part of the Twente DesignLab, not only connecting philosophical and ethical reflection with design.

6. Valorisation and outreach

Verbeek's focus on the social roles of technology makes valorisation an intrinsic part of his work. He studies socially impactful technologies in order to contribute to design practices, policy-making, public discussions, and science communication.

Design practices

Verbeek's work explicitly contributes to design practices, e.g. by informing design practices aimed at developing technologies that stimulate environmentally friendly behaviour, or the responsible design of drone technologies and telecare devices. As co-director of the DesignLab of the University of Twente he explicitly connects the social sciences to technological practices, by co-developing the method of 'Science2Design4Society', approaching design as a creative and innovative way to connect scientific developments to societal issues and challenges.

Policy-making

As a member of the Supervisory Board of TNO and as a member of the national Committee for Ethics and Health he uses his expertise in the relations between technology and society to contribute to policy-making practices. His expertise in the relations between science, technology, and society also makes him a frequently asked committee member and day chair by organizations like KNAW (e.g. as a member of the Dutch Council for the Humanities, and a member of the Humanities Committee of the National Science Agenda) and NWO (e.g. as day chair of the 'Science for Science' meeting of the National Science Agenda, chair of the stakeholder meeting about the new NWO strategy, columnist at the presentation meeting of the NWO strategy).

Public discussions

Besides this, Verbeek facilitates and initiates public discussions about technologies such as obstetric ultrasound, human enhancement technologies, Google Glass, and drones. He explicitly aims to address a wider audience with parts of his work, combining international scientific publications with Dutch-language popular publications, most notably his books De Grens van de Mens and Op de vleugels van Icarus. He often gives public lectures and he gave talks at the Lowlands pop festival and De Zwarte Cross, he has given TV lectures, is a regular member of the talkshow Het Filosofisch Kwintet, and recently played a central role in a six-episode documentary with Omroep VPRO about 'The makeable human'.

Science communication

Verbeek puts much effort in raising awareness of the importance of science communication. On a local scale, as a moderator of Science Café Enschede, as a monthly columnist for Tubantia and as a regular columnist for De Ingenieur. Nationally, as past chairman of The Young Academy: he co-authored a Young Academy Advisory Report Between Research And Society: Recommendations for Optimal Science Communication, stressing the importance of actively seeking dialogue and interaction with society about research, and co-organized the project The Young Academy Online, which made research activities of members audiovisually accessible via short research portraits. In articles in the national and regional press, moreover, he tries to acquaint a wider audience with scientific practice. Between 2011 and 2016 he has been the chairman of the jury of the annual national Socrates Prize, for the best philosophy book in the Dutch language.
