

Article processing Charges (APCs)

Publishers will usually charge Article Processing Charges (APCs) for open-access publishing. On the invoice, APCs are often described as 'Article Processing Charge', 'APC', 'Open Access', 'Processing Cost', 'Publishing Fee' or a combination of the above. APCs are charged on top of general publication charges such as excess charges for additional pages, colour, cover, or services like language editing.

Please register the costs that are charged for open access in PURE, under 'Article Processing Charge (APC)':

- Choose: 'Not set' when the publication is open access, but you don't know how much was charged for open access. You can recognize an open-access publication by the information on the publication itself, usually on the first page. Open-access publications have a licence for re-use and the authors hold the copyright. Often, you will even see 'This is an open access publication':

© 2020 The Author(s). Published by Elsevier Inc. This is an open access article under the CC BY license (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0>).

- Choose: 'No' when (1) the publication is not open access or (2) the publication is open access, but no APCs were charged, for example because the authors received a 100% discount.

Choose: 'Yes' when the publication is open access and APCs were charged:

- > Underneath 'APC amount in paid currency', fill in the amount to be paid (including VAT and discounts) and the currency as stated on the invoice.
- > Underneath 'APC amount', fill in the amount in euros that was actually paid (if known).
